Death Beach Phallus

From the series With Love From Death Beach, 2024

Death Beach Phallus is a confrontation with desire, decay, and the eternal. Spooner's first sculpture series and his first work in bronze, inspired by Brâncuși's modernist abstractions, the works operate in the territory of ancient Roman fertility talismans while refusing simple representation — embodying the tension between Eros and Thanatos, between the momentary impulse of creation and bronze's promise of immortality.

Hollow-cast and functional, each sculpture serves as a vessel for burning incense — a gesture of desire preserved against time, still capable of generating smoke, scent, and ceremony.

Disaster is a child's song. A prophecy spoken by a madman. A dream dreaming of fishes.

There is a hole that feels like fire. A forest crossed in sleep. A house standing alone. A piece of land that seems to be crying.

Small, irritating omens. Desire between confusion and innocence. The promise of safety. Misplaced faith.

It is about refusal and acceptance, but mainly refusal.

Disaster is about wounds that have not happened yet. Perhaps they never will. But if they do, they will grow like roots.

A film trying to remember.

A film trying to forget.

A film trying to forgive.

I found water in the soil.

Sofiia Stepanova (b. 1994, Kyiv) is a Ukrainian artist based in Berlin. She studied painting at the Kyiv Academy of Fine Arts and Architecture, where her background in iconography, religious art, and symbolism continues to inform the compositional and psychological structure of her work.

Her practice explores instability within systems of identity. Through shifting figures, fragmented bodies, and loosely staged environments, she creates images where vulnerability and control coexist. Figures move between physical presence and dissolution, often appearing displaced, obscured, or held as traces of memory.

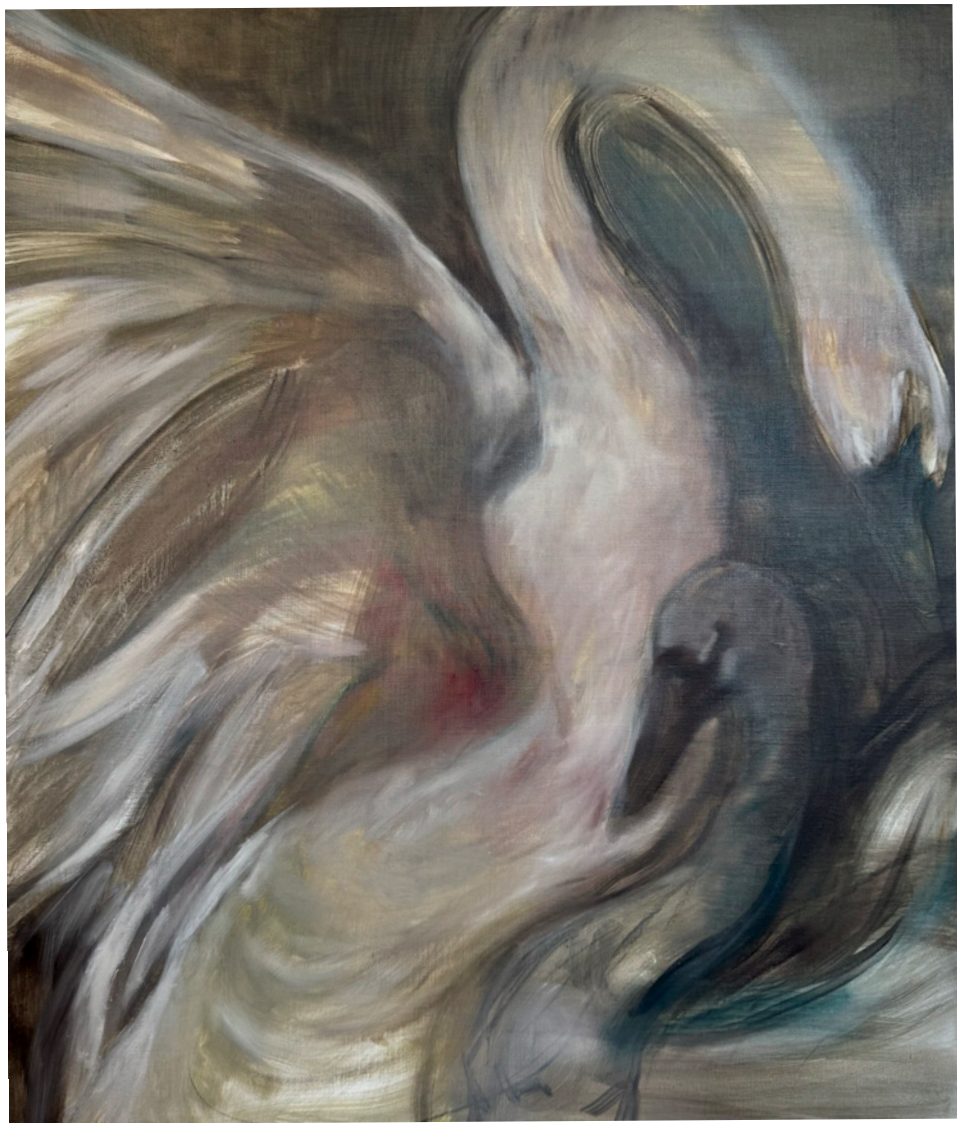

Stepanova is interested in gestures and emotional patterns that repeat unconsciously, often without clear origin. Rather than presenting fixed individuals, her figures emerge through memory, shifting roles, and their relationships to one another. This sense of recurrence extends into the natural world, where cycles of growth, decay, and return echo patterns of human experience. Her work resists fixed identities and linear narratives.
